Music lovers need to add Hamburg to their hotlist of great music destinations around the world. The new Elbphilharmonie Concert Hall, a 2,100-capacity venue, has given the city a new focal point for classical music. The city of world-famous composers was once described by the composer Georg Philipp Telemann as a place “where music seems, as it were, to have its homeland”. In Hamburg, the many-faceted Baroque composer was municipal Director of Music for 46 years. Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, the “Hamburg Bach” and Telemann’s godson, succeeded him in 1768. He was celebrated by his contemporaries as an “original genius” and lived in the city up to his death in 1788. At the beginning of the nineteenth century, the immensely musically gifted siblings Fanny and Felix Mendelssohn were born in Hamburg. Johannes Brahms, born in the Gängeviertel, made his debut as a pianist and composer here. In 1891 Gustav Mahler came to Hamburg to take up a position as First Conductor at the Hamburg Stadt-Theater.
